The Floating Coffins

The phenomenon of the floating coffins emerged in the mid-19th century when the bodies of several deceased individuals were discovered floating in the murky waters of the River Humber. These coffins, constructed from sturdy oak, were unusually buoyant, defying the natural laws of gravity. The authorities were baffled by this strange occurrence, as the coffins showed no signs of tampering or damage.

As more and more coffins surfaced, the mystery grew. Theories abounded, ranging from the supernatural to the mundane. Some whispered of ghostly apparitions haunting the river, while others suggested that the coffins were simply victims of exceptionally strong tides and currents. However, one name kept recurring in the local folklore: Caitlin Lucas.

and fell into the swollen River Humber, drowning before anyone could come to her aid.

Her untimely demise sent shockwaves through the community, but what made Caitlin's case truly extraordinary was the subsequent discovery of her coffin floating in the river.
