- Increased inequality: Globalization has led to a widening gap between the rich and the poor, both within and between countries. This is because globalization has allowed businesses to move production to countries with lower labor costs, putting downward pressure on wages in developed countries. At the same time, globalization has led to increased competition for jobs, which has also contributed to wage stagnation.

- Increased poverty: Globalization has also contributed to increased poverty, particularly in developing countries. This is because globalization has led to a decline in the prices of agricultural products, making it difficult for farmers in developing countries to earn a living. Additionally, globalization has led to increased competition for jobs, which has put downward pressure on wages in developing countries.
- Environmental degradation: Globalization has also contributed to environmental degradation. This is because globalization has led to increased production and consumption, which has put a strain on the environment. Additionally, globalization has led to the increased movement of goods and people, which has spread pollution and invasive species around the world.

Arguments for the View that Globalization Has Not Gone Too Far

Those who argue that globalization has not gone too far point to a number of benefits, including:

- Increased economic growth: Globalization has led to increased economic growth, both in developed and developing countries. This is because globalization has allowed businesses to access new markets and sources of production, which has led to increased investment and job creation. Additionally, globalization has led to increased competition, which has helped to lower prices for consumers.
- Increased innovation: Globalization has also led to increased innovation. This is because globalization has allowed businesses to access new ideas and technologies from around the world.

Additionally, globalization has created a larger market for new products and services, which has encouraged businesses to invest in research and development.

- Increased cultural exchange: Globalization has also led to increased cultural exchange. This is because globalization has made it easier for people from different cultures to travel and communicate with each other. Additionally, globalization has led to the spread of popular culture, such as music, movies, and television shows, which has helped to break down cultural barriers.

The debate over globalization is complex and there are valid arguments on both sides. However, the evidence suggests that globalization has brought both benefits and costs. It is important to be aware of the potential drawbacks of globalization and to take steps to mitigate its negative effects. At the same time, it is important to recognize the benefits of globalization and to continue to promote it in a way that benefits all.
